Many think of and love retinol as the skincare ingredient for reducing signs of photoaging, UV damage, and hyperpigmentation, but those with sensitive skin might be less receptive to it. Retinol, a form of vitamin A, can become an irritant and cause redness, dryness, and flaking—all things that people with sensitive skin already face. Thankfully, avoiding retinol doesn't mean you can never experience the benefits it provides.

If retinol isn't an option for you, there are alternative ingredients that offer similar advantages—most famous of which is bakuchiol. The all-natural retinol alternative has antioxidant properties that give it similar anti-aging properties, but bakuchiol is much less irritating by comparison. And people who are eager to try out the ingredient can't stop praising Tula's Wrinkle Treatment Drops Retinol Alternative Serum that puts bakuchiol front and center; reviewers with dry and sensitive skin actually said it left their faces "smoother and with a better glow."

Along with bakuchiol, the Wrinkle Treatment Drops serum is formulated with stevia and alfalfa sprouts as two other retinol alternatives to give you a heaping dose of antioxidant protection and shield your skin from free radicals (which attack your skin barrier to create signs of photoaging like wrinkles and fine lines). On top of these anti-aging protectors, the serum features squalane, an ingredient that locks in moisture on dry skin to seal in all the hydration you need. Moisturizing jojoba seed oil, anti-aging goji berry, and carrot root extracts in the serum are all cherries on top to nourish and smooth out your skin.

Reviewers said that the serum is truly non-irritating and absorbs really well into the skin—even that they've seen plumper, softer, and smoother skin on faces with fine lines, wrinkles, and dryness as a result. Many wrote that it's "far easier" on sensitive skin than traditional retinol, and that it eliminated the "terrible burning and redness" they'd get from the vitamin A ingredient. "No burning, no stinging, and I have sensitive skin," said a reviewer of their reaction to the serum.
